

Recent routing failures caused several short outages across the internal network. Packet flow analysis showed that redundant paths were not activated during link degradation. The root cause was traced to outdated failover policies that did not meet current traffic demands. Updating the routing tables and enabling dynamic load balancing significantly improved network stability.